Electrochemical ion spectrometry (EIS) is a fast, simple, and sensitive method that has been used for chemical imaging, but the signal response is weak. In this study, we designed and constructed a novel electrochemical ion spectrometer (EIS) and applied it to the imaging of local halogen-containing species (e.g., I-Br). We first examined the effect of electrode surface treatment on the sensitivity of EIS and found that a 10 nm gold nanoparticle-modified electrode gave the highest response. We then characterized the interfacial conditions of the electrode with I-Br by nanostructuring the electrode, and found that the most stable interfacial state was achieved by a 10 nm gold nanoparticle-modified electrode. In addition, we evaluated the interfacial reaction between the nanoparticle-modified electrode and I-Br and found that the reaction was a disintegration reaction that resulted in a vaporization of iodide. We developed an EIS-ion mobility spectrometry (IMS) system 77a5ca646e
