Logical sufficiency of evidence for hypothesis The logical sufficiency of evidence for hypothesis (also known as the logical soundness of argument or the logical proof) is a central concept in philosophical logic. It was first formulated by Georg Cantor and Carl Friedrich Fries. Some modern formal theories (e.g. sequent calculi) include a logic of hypotheses, which is analyzed in terms of logical sufficiency of evidence for hypotheses. The basic principle of sufficiency is the principle that if a proposition follows from the premisses, then the conclusion is true. The logical sufficiency of evidence for a hypothesis is the notion that a conclusion entails a hypothesis whenever it is deduced from the premisses. This is what is meant by the word 'adequate' in the quotation. This principle permits the deductive proof of statements to be interpreted from a particular perspective, without restricting the type of deductions. The principle is not the same as the principle that a conclusion entails a hypothesis whenever it is deduced from the premisses, nor is it the same as the principle that there is an adequate proof for a hypothesis when it follows from the premisses. It is not a principle of the same type, but rather a conditional principle between the logic of deduction and the logic of hypotheses. Inference If the premisses are given, the conclusion, where 'A' is the assumption, can be considered to be true or false. The logical sufficiency of evidence for a hypothesis is the possibility that a conclusion can be deduced from the premisses without changing its truth value. That is, if the conclusion would not change its truth value when deduced from the premisses, then the evidence of the premisses is sufficient to infer the conclusion. Definitions
